Death, disability, economic loss...

Work related disease and trauma affect working men and women worldwide and have been the subject of extensive research for many years.

Now this comprehensive and thought-provoking book brings together a team of internationally recognised experts to provide a review of current epidemiological knowledge in this important area.

- Edited by J Corbett McDonald, a well known authority in epidemiological research, with contributions from around the world
- Critically assesses the available scientific evidence for the main disease groups
- Essential reading for all concerned with the causation and prevention of the widespread and serious effects – immediate and long term – of work on health.
- Fully referenced throughout

Topics covered include: Occupational cancer; asthma; electro-magnetic fields and ionising radiation; noise and vibration; skin conditions; mental stress; work in pregnancy; agricultural hazards; back and limb disorders; neurobehavioural effects; research methodology and evaluation.
