Blackcurrant syrup in modern therapy

High content of vitamin C

The longer the war goes on, the greater is the attention bestowed on the therapeutic qualities of the homely, home-grown blackcurrant. And yet it would be wrong to attribute this interest entirely to war conditions.

Prior to the war, certain results reached by the well-known research workers Fixsen and Roscoe showed the blackcurrant to be a particularly rich source of natural vitamin C—136 to 220 mg. per 100 gm. for blackcurrant juice as against 22 to 89 mg. for orange juice.

In Ribena Blackcurrant Syrup the physician in charge of industrial staffs has at hand a therapeutic syrup not merely high in vitamin C (20 mg. ascorbic acid per fluid ounce) but having also the associated factors of the natural vitamin.
